" More and more Boks are coming from the bigger cities, and thus the bigger schools. This may be because of the advent of professionalism. A school boy from one of the bigger schools is more likely to make a Craven Week team, and that is where the scouts will be waiting to potentially offer that opportunity to play rugby professionally. So don't be surprised if most of the future Boks end up coming from the big city schools. But we also need to develop schools in the disadvantaged areas, rather than removing talented underprivileged players."
